What's on TV Saturday: 'The Letdown' and 'Indivisible'

By SARA ARIDI APRIL 21, 2018

"The Letdown" puts a comedic spin on motherhood. And "Indivisible" follows three undocumented immigrants at the heart of a national debate.

What's Streaming

THE LETDOWN on Netflix. Despite her determination to hold onto her former life after becoming a mother, Audrey (Alison Bell) quickly learns that parenthood is pretty much a full-time job. Her husband is too caught up with his career to help tend to their infant, so Audrey joins a new-parents support group and befriends other stressed-out moms. This Australian comedy blends emotional sob sessions with witty one-liners, leaving you pitying and laughing at the new parents.

GREAT WIDE OPEN on Fandor and YouTube. Jared Leto is best known as an actor, the frontman for the rock band "30 Seconds to Mars" and a Snapchat enthusiast. But he's also a longtime rock climber. In this five-part documentary series, a passion project directed by Mr. Leto, he shares his love of the outdoors and explores five national parks alongside courageous adventurers. If you're looking for an excuse to spend more time in the wild, the breathtaking footage of green expanses and sun-kissed canyons should do the trick.

SATURDAY CHURCH (2018) on Amazon, Google Play and YouTube. After his father dies overseas, 14-year-old Ulysses (Luka Kain) feels the weight of responsibility on his shoulders. Adding to his grief, the teenager needs to hide his sexual orientation from his disapproving family. His only means of escape is drifting into a musical fantasy world where bullies become backup dancers — until he's introduced to Saturday Church, a program for at-risk L.G.B.T. youth. Glenn Kenny named the film a Critic's Pick in his review.

Teodoro, Evelyn Rivera and Antonio Alarcon hadn't seen their loved ones in years; their families were either deported or chose to "self-deport" under harrowing circumstances. This film follows the group as they knock on doors, lead protests and implore politicians to prioritize family reunification for Dreamers, or immigrants who grew up in the country without legal status.

SATURDAY STACK: PUNK ROCK 1 p.m. on AXS TV. This raucous marathon of punk programming begins with back-to-back episodes of "Rock Legends." The first charts the rise of the genre with a look at the trailblazing group "The Clash," while the second profiles the Californian band "Green Day." Not a fan of either? Catch live performances by "Blondie" and "The New York Dolls" at 2 and 3 p.m.

CHRISTIANE AMANPOUR: SEX & LOVE AROUND THE WORLD 10 p.m. on CNN. Christiane Amanpour concludes this travelogue series in Shanghai, where more women are challenging conservative attitudes toward marriage and relationships. Ms. Amanpour meets an artist whose work straddles the divide between self-expression and censorship, and interviews Jin Xing, a TV host who had gender reassignment surgery.
